Excerpt: . . . NELLIE, A WAYWARD GIRL. Nellie Tiese was born and had always lived in one of those western Pennsylvania towns, where coal-mines and oil-wells are the controlling factors. Up to the age of seventeen, Nellie had lived the life of the ordinary girl in a small town. She was a little under middle height, with light brown hair, eyes of a grayish blue with a roguish glint in them, a kissable mouth, the least touch of olive running through her complexion, just enough to keep her skin from being a pure white, and she was inclined to be plump. Altogether Nellie was a very attractive little piece of femininity, and this fact was generally recognized by the young men of her native town. There was not a Harvest Home, a country picnic, a taffy-pull or corn-husking, not a dancing social or straw-ride, in which Nellie was not an important participant. And the young fellow who secured the pleasure of her company at any of these fashionable affairs, had to keep his eyes open and make the engagement long in advance, or some other chap would snap up the little favorite as quick as a flash. Nellie was pretty, and she knew it. It could not be otherwise with so many beaux to whisper it in her ears or almost speak it with their admiring eyes. Besides being good-looking, Nellie was good company. She could talk well and was full of fun. Her father was a...
