Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Thomas Carlyle Carlyle's father and mother were strictly religious people. They belonged to a sect of Seceders from the old Scottish Kirk, and worshiped in a little rustic meeting-house. They were Calvinists of the old-fashioned type. Nine years of Carlyle's life were passed amid these home influences. When he was ten, his Ecclefechan teacher, who regarded him as a genius, having made good report of his progress, and his minister's son having introduced him to Latin, his father decided to send him to the grammar school at Annan, six miles distant. Here his instruction was mechanical, and only moderately good; his schoolmates, owing to his small size, his quiet, retiring habits, and his fidelity, long maintained, to a promise given his mother never to fight, treated him harshly, nick-named him the Tearful, and his time, as he said, was utterly wasted; an assertion which was scarcely true, since by means of some small store of curious reading, by going much to the craftsmen's workshops, and especially by the help of his...
